

Social, cognitive and computational approaches to person perception and interaction

Richard Ramsey
ETH Zurich, www.rich-ramsey.com
richard.ramsey@hest.ethz.ch

Abstract Social interaction often feels effortless, yet depends on complex cognitive and neural processes. In this talk, I will review recent studies using social, cognitive and computational approaches that uncover deeper insights into social cognition and brain function. Using examples from group bias, person perception and cognitive control paradigms, as well as work investigating individual differences, I will demonstrate the value of using diverse methodological approaches and open science best practices for understanding social behaviour.